Law360, New York (February 27, 2014, 7:32 PM ET) — New York City's move to expand the number of business required to pay sick time, and sharply accelerate the timetable for compliance, has triggered a flood of concern among employers who don't know if their current policies need fixes and have little time to figure it out, lawyers said Thursday.

Attorneys whose management-side clients were scrambling to comply with a now-outdated law passed last year said their phones had started ringing anew after the New York City Council voted overwhelmingly Wednesday to ratchet down the size...
