

REMINDER: New York Employers Must Submit Affirmation to State When Reopening

As “Phase 2” non-essential businesses reopen, New York State has issued industry-specific interim guidance, which includes detailed safety measures, such as physical distancing and the use of protective equipment, that businesses must implement prior to reopening, and once business operations resume. Specifically, prior to reopening, all non-essential businesses must complete the following compliance steps:

1. Read its industry’s particularized reopening guidelines and have its owner or agent submit an online affirmation confirming that the business will reopen and operate in accordance with the State’s guidelines, which includes “daily health screening practices.” These guidelines, and affirmation, for Phase 2 non-essential businesses can be found here.
2. Create a written business reopening safety plan and conspicuously post it in the workplace. Businesses can use this template provided by New York State, to create a safety plan, or use our custom Kaufman Dolowich & Voluck safety plan template found here. Businesses may also create their own safety plan in accordance with such guidelines.

As various counties within New York begin to reopen, it is crucial that all businesses are aware of these new guidelines and proactively to take steps towards compliance. It is also critical that all non-essential businesses review their industry specific guidance to ensure compliance with the unique requirements applicable to their business. The attorneys at Kaufman Dolowich & Voluck are available to provide such guidance as New York employers reopen.
